Welcome!

Thank you for joining us for the third Research Symposium hosted by LLUH Research Affairs. We appreciate your interest in the research enterprise of our institution.

Today, scarce funding and limited resources are facts of life in the current research environment. Consequently, success demands exhaustive planning, creative thought, and superb judgement. In Research Affairs, we have noticed that these demands increasingly require collaborations within a diversified, highly coordinated team of partners.

In this symposium, we will explore multiple aspects of collaboration: among the members of a clinical or laboratory team, with associates elsewhere in the country, and with international contributors. The symposium begins with a presentation from President Richard Hart who will sketch the “big picture” of research at LLUH followed by a discussion of the challenges and opportunities perceived by the directors and associate deans of research from the various schools.

Subsequently, Dr. Kimberly Payne will draw from her personal experience to highlight the principles of effective collaboration and team building. Successive sessions will build on these introductory presentations to show how these guidelines have been applied and interpreted in a variety of research settings.

It is our hope that the symposium will stimulate your thoughts about research collaborations, whether you are a principal investigator, a key partner in a research group, or a valued member of the support team. I invite you to apply the concepts and suggestions provided by this symposium to expand the boundaries of your research team through networking and partnerships, formal or causal, to increase your opportunities for success. Don't hesitate to let us know how Research Affairs can assist you.

I sincerely hope that you achieve your research goals.
